Book Review: Shari’ah Maxims Modern Applications in Islamic Finance by Muhammad Tahir Mansoori

Abdul Azim Islahi

Islamic Economics Institute, King Abdulaziz University, Jeddah

2013

Online at https://mpra.ub.uni-muenchen.de/61797/
MPRA Paper No. 61797, posted 2 February 2015 10:34 UTC
Shari'ah Maxims Modern Applications in Islamic Finance
Author: Muhammad Tahir Mansoori

Reviewed by Abdul Azim Islahi

Shari'ah Maxims Modern Applications in Islamic Finance by Muhammad Tahir Mansoori is a second updated and revised edition of his previous work published under the same title in 2007. The author is presently Director General of Shari'ah Academy, International Islamic University, Islamabad, Pakistan. In producing this work the author has banked on his experience of teaching courses on legal maxims in the field of Islamic banking and finance. He has also gained practical experience of Islamic banking as being Shari'ah advisor to a leading banking institution in Pakistan, and a member of the Task Force on Islamic Banking, State Bank of Pakistan.

The book begins with a preface in which the author tell us that the book is meant to be used as a text book for the students of M Sc. (Islamic Banking and Finance) programs. He has selected in the book those maxims which are relevant to the commercial law of Islam and more specifically, to the field of Islamic banking and finance. In the preface he also points out importance of Shari'ah maxims for Muslim jurists, muftis, and judges in finding rules in new incidences, exercise of ijtihad and decision making as they ‘convey the spirit, wisdom, logic and philosophy of Islamic law.’ They also serve as an ‘interpretative aid with the help of which Shari’ah rules can be interpreted.’ However, he does not mention anywhere what improvements and additions he has made in the second addition, something which a reader may like to know. The Preface is followed by a valuable Foreword which was written by (late) Dr. Mahmood Ahmad Ghazi for the first edition of the book.

The book has two parts. The first part deals with five major maxims with their applications to Islamic business transactions and banking. The second part discusses some important themes of Islamic commercial law, such as contractual stipulation, status of promise, disposition of others’ property, concept of liability and trust, gharar, riba, and sale and agency. An attempt has been made to trace the origins of respective maxims.

The first chapter is devoted to introduction of Shari’ah maxims. It deals with the nature and functions of qawa'id fiqhiyyah, their application and legal status, differences between principles of jurisprudence and Shari’ah maxims. He also differentiates between qawa'id fiqhiyyah and dawabit fiqhiyyah. The former “represents a general rule, or principle and covers a large number of fighi ahkam relating to a particular theme” pp.1-2, while dawabit (plural of dabitah = rule) are “the controlling rules, and abstractions of rules, of fiqh on specific themes” p. 3. At the end it surveys the historical development of Shari’ah maxims and major works on the subject in various schools of jurisprudence as well as works by modern scholars. However, development portion is confined to Hanafi School only.

There is very close relation between Shari’ah maxims and Shari’ah objectives (maqasid Shari'ah). Although a brief discussion has come about Shari'ah objectives while discussing necessities pp. 95-100, the book could have been enriched by adding a separate chapter on maqasid Shari'ah and its relation with Shari'ah maxims.

Chapter two is on “Intention and motivating cause of contract” that plays ‘a pivotal role in determination of its legal status’. It is based on a hadith: 1) “Verily, the acts are judged by the intention.” Three maxims are derived from this hadith: “Basis of all acts is objective thereof (al-umur bi-maqasidiha), 2) “In contracts, effect is given to the objectives and meanings not to the words and phrases”, and 3) “Every legal artifice whereby nullification of aright, or affirmation of a wrong, is devised is unlawful”. The author fully explains these maxims and demonstrates their applications in the field of banking and finance. In the light of these rules correct positions of controversial contracts like bay' al-inah, bay' al-wafa, tawarruq, commodity murabahah, and sale and lease back sukuk can be determined. This provides a context to deal with the stands of various schools of jurisprudence towards the legal devices and stratagems (hiyal). In this connection, the author discusses Hanafi, Maliki and Hanbali positions only and missed to give the Shafi’i stand. At the end, the author rightly observed that “there are certain legal devices which do not frustrate the purpose and spirit of Islamic law.” Such devices can be accepted as they are way out of certain difficulties if they are not in conflict with the Shari'ah objectives. The author thinks that ‘legal devices in Islamic banks predominantly belong to this category’ p. 56.

Chapter three deals with the concept of elimination of detriment. The maxims relevant to this are: “Harm and retaliation by harm is not allowed” p. 65, “Harm has to be redressed” p.77, “Repelling evil supercedes securing benefits” p. 90, and “harm cannot compensate harm” p. 92. The author gives meaning and applications of these maxims. For example, laws related to inhibition, pre-emption, continuation of crop sharing contract till harvesting, liability of craftsmen, and penalty for default in murabahah and ijarah financing come under “No harm should be caused and none should be suffered” (la darar wa la dirar). Similarly, option of defect (khiyar al-ayb), option of fraudulent lesion (khiyar al-ghabn) and various rules to achieve them come under the maxim “harm has to be redressed.” Thus, Shari’ah maxims help not only in finding rule where there is no rule in new incidence, but they also help understand wisdom and objectives behind various Shari’ah rules.

Chapter four discusses rules of relaxation in Islamic law. In this connection the author notes two main maxims: “Hardship begets ease” and “Necessities relax prohibitions”. He presents some modern fiqh rulings based on these principles, such as ‘verdict of Islamic Fiqh Academy of India on permissibility of insurance for Indian Muslims’, and ‘verdict of European Fiqh Council about mortgage financing for purchase of houses’. He rightly cautions that these rules are not absolute or unrestricted and presents certain counter rules which define and restrict the scope of relaxation based on necessity and hardship. A closely related maxim is “A hajah (need) whether of private or public nature, is treated like darurah (necessity)”. It is this rule which worked behind permission of bay'al-salam, istisna', bay' al-wafa, ijarah, etc. pp. 106-7. In the fiqh literature, there is no demarcation when a hajah will be considered as darurah (necessity). Jurists generally leave it to the person or institution facing the situation (mubtala bihi). But this leaves scope to misuse or abuse this maxim. Perhaps, because of this feeling the author at the end of the chapter suggests that “in order to avoid the abuse of hajah, in legislation, it seems appropriate that a competent body of Muslim scholars, instead of few scholars, should frame concessionary laws, based on hajah ascertaining its necessity and magnitude” p. 117.

In every society customs and common practices among the people have been given a place in legislation, and judges have recourse to such customs if no clear law exists in such matters. Islam has also recognized such customs, called ‘urf, as a source of law in Shari’ah. Chapter five examines ‘status and authority of customs in Islamic law’. The author gives a number of Shari’ah maxims based on ‘urf. Using this maxim the jurists have decided issues concerning ‘urbun sale, penalties on various economic offences, cash waqf, right of retaining possession (badl al-khuluww), and forms of possession (qabd) in modern commercial practices. It may be stressed that not every custom is effective in juridical decision making. It should be a common practice and widely accepted, and it should not be contradictory to the injunctions of Shari’ah. If a ‘urf is changed, the rule based on shuch a ‘urf will be modified according to the existing ‘urf. In this connection, however, the author’s following statement is confusing and may create misconception: “In the classical Islamic law, if two parties exchanged one mudd of wheat with two mudd of wheat, they were said to have committed riba’l-fadl. But today wheat is calculated through weight, so riba-al-fadl will take place only when, say, 5 kg is exchanged with 8 kg” (emphasis added) p. 120. Does he mean, if a person exchanges today 5 mudd wheat with 8 mudd, there will be no riba’l-fadl? Or conversely, if in old days 5 ratl wheat was exchanged with 8 ratl, was there no riba’l-fadl?? In fact the difference of quantity is prohibited and riba’l-fadl will occur whether it is done through measure, weight or estimation so for wheat is considered as mal ribawi. It is the causation (illah) that may be a subject of discussion in the light of present custom of wheat being a commodity exchanged through weight.

Chapter six deals with the Shari’ah maxim related to certainty versus doubt and presumption of continuity. According to this maxim “Certainty is not dispelled by doubt” ‘a rule of law, or thing, established with certainty continues to remain so, and the doubt, as to change in the position, does not affect the established position’ p. 139. The author presents several examples of the application of this maxim.

There are many maxims based on the rule of presumption of continuity such as: “The original rule for all things is permissibility”; “Freedom from liability is the fundamental principle”; “No weight is given to mere supposition”; “No argument is admitted against supposition based upon evidence”; and “No statement is attributed to a man who keep silence, but silence is tantamount to a statement where there is necessity for speech” pp. 140-50. The author substantiates these maxims with Shari’ah evidences and shows their applications in economic life.

Chapter seven is on ‘legal status of contractual stipulations’ which are “inserted in the contract by mutual consents, to modify and change the effect which the Shari’ah accords to a contract, and to impose some extra liability on a party, with a view to give some extra advantage to the other party” p. 151. This has been a controversial issue among the jurists. The author presents the viewpoints of main schools of jurisprudence about such ancillary conditions. A number of maxims has been developed to reflect the authentic position on contractual stipulations, such as: “Every condition that violates definitive principles of Shari'ah is void”; “The principle in contracts and stipulations is permissibility”; “Condition has to be abided by as far as possible”; and “A contract contingent upon condition will take effect only when the condition is fulfilled”. The author has fully explained the meanings and applications of these maxims.

Chapter eight discusses ‘status of promise in Islamic law’. Under this the author states that “the prominent viewpoints in classical law are that simple promises are not legally enforceable.” However, a promise that is made in the form of a guarantee is unanimously enforceable. While discussing the Shari'ah stand on promise (wa'd) he quote verses of the Qur’an which are about covenant ('ahd) p. 161. There is clear difference between wa'd and 'ahd. The only maxim noted in this chapter is “Promises that entail guarantee are binding”. This maxim has been applied “to every promise in which the promisee incurs some risk, and liability, and performs the act demanded in the promise” p. 164.

Chapter nine is regarding maxims on disposition of others’ property. Under this the author notes rules like: No person may deal with the property of another, without latter’s permission; any order given to dispose of the property of another is void; no one may take the property of another, except with a legal cause; and authority in respect of people’s affairs should be exercised for their welfare only, p. 172. These rules have been enacted because protection of property, earned through lawful means, is one of the objectives of Shari'ah and the Qur’an and sunnah have forbidden to devour others’ property through wrong means. The author has clearly noted when interference in one’s property is permissible and justified.

Chapter ten traces maxims that differentiate liability (daman) versus trust (amanah). If a person holds an object in fiduciary capacity, it is called amanah. But if he holds it as guarantor, it is called daman. The two have different rules in case of any loss or damage to the object. The maxim is: “Trustee is not liable to guarantee the trust”. Deposits, capitals of mudarabah and musharkah, ariyah, etc. are considered as amanah. The holders of these objects cannot be held liable for any injury to them, if he has exercised due care and diligence, and the loss or injury occurs without his negligence or fault. On the other hand, if an object is held in custody by a person to own it, like buyer or usurper, borrower of money, etc. and something happens to the object, then he will held liable to it. Again, agency and personal guarantee cannot be combined because such an arrangement in respect of an investment turns the transaction into an interest based loan, when the capital and the proceeds of the investment are guaranteed, pp. 179-80. In this regard the maxim is: “Entitlement to profit depends upon liability for loss”.

Chapter eleven deals with the Shari‘ah maxim on gharar. The author gives various definition of gharar by past and present scholars. But he is not explicit which definition he prefers. However, he concludes that “gharar contains characteristics such as risk, hazard, speculation, uncertain outcome and unknown future benefits. A contract involving gharar causes undue benefits, and enrichment, for a party, at the cost of other party” p. 189. The author notes various ahadith from which prohibition of gharar is derived. According to him, “a close examination of ahadith on gharar, reveals that four types of risks and uncertainty are involved in the gharar transaction.” They are gambling and speculation, uncertain outcome, unknown future benefits, and inexactitude. Maxims related to gharar are as follows: To sell what one does not have, is unlawful. A gharar, when found in the principal object of contract, renders it invalid. Gharar invalidates commutative contracts, not gratuitous contracts. A trifling gharar, which is not related to a principal object, is permissible. He explains these maxims with relevant examples. It is true that most of Muslim scholars are against conventional insurance as it involves gharar and they suggest takaful as substitute. Here the author goes into unnecessary details of various models of takaful, such as waqf model, mudarabah model, wakalah model, etc.

Chapter twelve is concerned with a very important topic of Islamic economics and finance – Shari‘ah maxim of riba. At the outset the author gives various definitions of riba and mixes up riba’l-Qur’an (the conventional interest) with riba’l-hadith (prohibition of barter exchange of specific commodities with unequal quantity and/or time of delivery, termed as riba’l-fadl and riba’l-nasiah respectively). In a work on maxims, the two types of riba should have been distinguished clearly. Riba or interest has been known since ancient days: charging extra amount on loans in lieu of time given for use. Also known as riba’l-qurud (interest on loans) or riba’l-duyun (interest on debts). Riba’l-hadith is also called riba’l-buyu‘ (interest in exchange or trading as it takes the form of barter exchange). Riba’l-Qur’an is prohibited purposely while riba’l-hadith, for many scholars, is prohibited as a precautionary measure so that it may not become a means of taking actual interest. Obviously the prohibition of the latter is less severe than that of the former.

The author notes two main maxims with respect to riba: “Every loan that entails benefit is riba”, and “If a riba bearing counter value, is exchanged for similar counter value, equality and immediate possession are obligatory, and if it is exchanged for different species, immediate possession alone, is obligatory. When effective causes are different, none of these obligations arise” p. 210. Clearly the second maxim is specific to riba’l-hadith.

The last chapter discusses maxims on sale and agency which “belong to a number of topics, such as contractual capacity of contracting parties, lawfulness of subject matter, void, irregular and suspended sales, nature and scope of agency, and include many other issues of sale and agency”. The author notes here more than a dozen of maxims. Indeed, some of them are so important that they deserve separate chapter.
At the end the book contains a very useful annexure: Shari’ah maxims of al-Majallah - English translation with Arabic text. This helps the reader to go through the relevant maxims at a glance.

It may be noted that there is very strong relation between Shari’ah maxims and behavioral fiqh (al-mu'alamat). Economics and finance being behavioral science, knowledge of Shari’ah maxim is essential for Islamic economics and finance. It helps the students and decision makers develop insights in new economic matters and reach correct conclusions.

As a whole, the book is well documented but no reference is given to the opinion of Vogel and Samuel p.165. On p.197, he quotes various scholars on gharar without references. Similarly, references have not been provided for ahadith quoted on pp. 206, 213, 215, etc.

The present book is, perhaps, the first text book on Shari’ah maxims with modern application in Islamic finance. The author’s simple language and his lucid style are highly suitable for this purpose. Tahir Mansoori and Shari’ah Academy have done a good job in producing this book and making it as much easy and interesting for the students to master a subject that is a new and a tough subject.